As freedom of movement is affected and curtailed by lockdowns and various social distancing measures during the pandemic, the amount of digital interaction on social media and information exchange on the internet has skyrocketed.

We are constantly being bombarded by a daily barrage of information from different sources and platforms, it seems, and exhaust ourselves trying to process, filter and digest all this information, not all of which may be accurate, useful or even wanted in the first place.

This print from the Picture Diary series is created using multiple layers of images salvaged from the "Recently Deleted" photo album in my phone. How much time do we spend consuming information that might eventually end up in our "Deleted" albums? Perhaps what we need in the face of this sea of information is the ability to identify what is truly important in our lives and channel our time and energies accordingly.
